1. What are Taiwan's strengths and weaknesses in coping with "globalization"? How can we minimize the impacts of such weaknesses? ( 25 % )
2. Based on your knowledge of "governance" in political science, please identify at least two of the most crucial issues of governance in Taiwan, and describe what Taiwan has achieved as well as what remains to be attained on such issues. ( 25 % )
3. All nationalist cultures depend heavily on the concept of national identity, and nationalist politics is a politics of identity: Egypt for the Egyptians, Africa for the Africans, India for the Indians, and so on. What Basil Davidson calls nationalism's "ambiguous fertility" creates not only the assertion of a once incomplete and suppressed but finally restored identity through national systems of education, but also the inculcation of new authority. This is equally true in the United States, where the tonic force of African-American doctrine, as if the wish to criticize the myth of White America also meant the need to supplant that myth with dogmatic new ones. (p. 267)
